“When in Rome: the role of group dynamics on tax evasion”

Schools, hospitals and public services all depend on money generated by general taxation. Almost everyone benefits from these services at some point in their lives. Yet we still do not know why some people deliberately evade paying taxes, and why others (who do pay taxes) tolerate or even condone tax-evaders. To answer these important questions, this project examines two countries – Italy and the UK, which have massively different levels of tax evasion. We use a psychological theory (“Subjective Group Dynamics”) to predict when, whether and why people tolerate tax evasion. Results will be employed to promote strategies for persuading and encouraging people to pay their taxes, for the benefit of all.
